R. Mooney and T. Khosravi, Multilingual Word Embeddings: Methods and Systems, 2016. A: Thanks for the great overview! I would like to add some clarifications regarding the differences between monolinguals, bilinguals and multilinguals. The language that you speak while learning and/or living in another country is referred to as your second language (L2), as opposed to your first language (L1). A monolingual does not have any second language, but a bilingual does. The big difference between the two is that a monolingual speaks a single language throughout his/her life, whereas a bilingual speaks two (or more) languages. A bilingual will only speak L2 in the presence of other people. This is quite understandable, since he/she doesn't want to be misunderstood. A multilingual, on the other hand, is a person that speaks more than one language. He/she may have many L2s (maybe even many more than one), and he/she can also speak one L1. For example, the Swiss citizen I studied in Switzerland speaks German, English and French, and is multilingual in that respect. Concerning your question, I would first like to make a small disclaimer. I am by no means an expert in this field, so please don't take my comments as such. A common misconception about bilinguals is that they learn two languages simultaneously, with one being the same one as in a monolingual case, and the other being a different one. What really happens is that during the initial stages, a bilingual learns to speak, read and write a second language. The first one remains his/her L1, but the second one starts to function as his/her L2. In other words, a bilingual does not learn two (different) languages at the same time. He/she learns a second language at the same time as he/she learns to speak, read and write in that language. This is done so that the two (or more) languages can be processed simultaneously in the brain. This is the main reason why a bilingual can speak two (or more) languages at the same time. In addition, in case you're interested, a multilingual usually learns one L1 and as many L2s as possible, so that they can easily communicate and understand each other. For example, if you learn English and Spanish, you could 82157476af
